

Review of: "Women in Military: Breaking Barriers & Shaping the Future"

Shweta Rawat

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The given article is "Women in Military: Breaking Barriers & Shaping the Future" by Dr. Ashwini Sonawane and Ishwari Rampure provides a comprehensive overview of the evolving role of women in military operations. Prima-facie it appears more suitable to be a review article, rather than a research paper, due to the content provided in it.

The research article highlights the historical context of women's involvement in the military, tracing it back to World War I and II, and then discussing contemporary developments, such as the increasing participation of women in combat roles. The article convincingly argues for the importance of gender equality in armed forces and showcases the diverse contributions women make to military operations.

However, the research methodology section is relatively brief. While the article mentions the use of secondary data from existing literature, it lacks detailed information about the specific sources consulted and the criteria for selecting relevant studies. Providing more transparency about the data collection process and sources consulted would enhance the article's rigor and reproducibility.

Additionally, the inclusion of statistical data and charts will add credibility to the analysis, providing quantitative evidence to support the claims made in the article.

While the article acknowledges the challenges women face in the military, such as gender stereotyping and lack of female role models, it could delve deeper into these issues and explore potential strategies for addressing them.