This is a very interesting article that uses histories to analyze concrete cases of people with disabilities related to their sexual experiences, the barriers, and stigma they face in experimenting with something that is a human right.

There are some phrases that can detonate stigma like “people with a disability are like children even if they are adults.” Not in all cases.

It would be very interesting to discuss how women and men access their sexual experiences in a different way based on social expectations (gender roles), and how different it is if they are attracted to same-sex people.
