The article presented and/or in some ways replicated previous research on mattering and life satisfaction of school students within their education-related or youthful lives, with the case in Kenya. It stated that the results showed or confirmed other previous or related research in the US or Western countries. Here, there is a question: to improve the quality of the research, so what? As the study had been conducted in Kenya, with certain socio-cultural and even political differences compared to other worlds, the author(s) needs to add more explanation. Does this mean that current globalization homogenizes the mattering and life satisfactions of young people around the globe, or are there other factors explaining these similarities? Best, M
