This is a very useful article, summarising the experiences succinctly and accurately. The scope is rather limited to the particular initiative, but it is well described within the context of the H3A work and within the wider research environment in Africa.

It would have been good if, in addition to the description of challenges, a few sentences of potential solutions/recommendations for tackling those challenges were included. In particular, regarding potential group harm and return of genetic results, H3A has produced interesting and relevant work and could have been mentioned. A very nice article indeed.
