

Review of: "Measuring Complexity using Information"

John Cioffi<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Stanford University

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The paper effectively integrates concepts from various scientific disciplines to propose a unified framework for measuring complexity. It provides an extensive literature review, citing significant works from different fields, which establishes a solid foundation for the proposed methods. The introduction of Infodynamics and the distinction between different types of information (useful, redundant, and noisy) is an innovative approach that adds depth to the study of complexity.